Jurist will act as a ‘caretaker’ of court

just him.

Some of the items he highlighted included a “Kids First” seminar for divorcing parents; requiring individuals under probation to work for a diploma; mediation in Child Protective Service cases; using video testimony of children in sex-assault cases; and creation of the first Texas multi-county drug court.

The drug court program involves continuing education for offenders to help them become part of the mainstream.

“And I believe it has a new zero recidivism rate among the graduates,” Jones said.

The judge said there is still work to be done, though.

He noted the judicial branch often gets overlooked and reminded county commissioners about the importance of the court system.

“The counties of the district should supplement the salary of the district judge by at least $5,000-$10,000,” he said. “And the counties must increase funding for the prosecution — including an increase in attorney compensation, adding positions for certified paralegals and increasing investigative staff.”

With almost two years left on the bench, Jones said he plans on serving as the “caretaker” of the court and not yield to political or public opinions or pressure.

“This is wonderful work. Some would say it’s God’s work and I agree,” he said. “I don’t know many ways you can serve your community as deeply within our chosen profession and get paid for it.”

Jones is also acknowledged as the architect of several technological innovations at the courthouse.

He is a certified public accountant, blogger, Navy veteran, bicyclist and kayaker and a member of the Marble Falls Daybreak Rotary Club. daniel@thepicayune.com
